

SCULPTURE & ART

"Wine and Sculpture both age well", David Ball.

Winmark Wines Owner and Vigneron Karin Adcock is an avid collector of art and sculptures and David Ball's monumental Biosis was the first of many sculptures to find their home at Winmark. Enjoy a Chardonnay tasting in the Cellar Door and explore the property to find spectacular sculptures reaching for the sky, whimsical installations and sculptures inspired by the Australian bush set against the natural landmarks of historical significance. Winmark is a place of remarkable beauty and unexpected discovery.

OPEN 7 DAYS

Biosis by David Ball

David Ball created Biosis for the Winmark landscape. His sculpture is bound to earth yet reaches towards heaven in representation of our highest dreams.

"Biosis works both from and with the landscape," David said. "It's broad, it reaches out and sits in this big, beautiful valley surrounded by sandstone and cliffs that are themselves like sculpture."

Fire's Edge by Amanda Lockton

The raw power and ferocity of nature, blackened bark, branches stripped bare of their foliage to reveal a new kind of beauty. Shape and form emerge from the destruction passed by the 2019/2020 Bushfires, to reveal a new beginning, new growth and life.

Autumn Saturation by Elisa Krey – Kreyfarer Ceramics

Elisa's ceramic mural preserves the stunning Winmark Perennial & Rose Garden designed by Paul Bangay OAM, in a creative interpretation of the garden through Autumn.

Incorporating photography to 'fossilise' images, they are kiln fired onto handmade stoneware tiles creating a one of a kind piece.

Kreyfarer studio was established in the Hunter Valley in 2018, with custom works available on request.

Wattle Season by Sharon Taylor

A fun, zoomed in view of happy wattle branches. Sharon is inspired by the natural environment, the shapes, forms, colours and textures of the Australian landscape. She loves to make pieces that can be put back into the landscape which has inspired them.

Portals of Illusion by Erik Flygenring, Denmark

Here we are. In the centre of the universe. In the navel of the world as we say in Denmark.

We look at 3 red portals placed to form a kind of train as you look through the line-up. We are the ones to imagine the walls and ceiling of this "train trunk". It represents our life and we are the ones responsible for making the most of it.

As you get to the last portal you find a pot of gold. Equally large objects, at the same distance are depicted as the same size. If they are moved away from the observer, they are depicted smaller and if moved closer they are depicted larger – this is the theory we explore with Portals of Illusion.

Ceramic Lollipops – Celebrating Colours by Alain Vagh

French ceramic artist Alain Vagh manufactures natural and luxury glazed terracotta for exclusive architectural conceptions. Winmark owner Karin Adcock picked up these stunning glazed works on a trip to Provence in 2019, and staying true to her innate artistic talents and ability to see beauty in all forms, created the Ceramic Lollipops installation at the Cellar Door.

Fight or Flight by Rode Vella

The Slingshot – Once a Hunting Weapon. Man's fight or flight response is triggered during the chase of a wild beast. Today a young boy's toy. Child-like enthusiasm extinguishes as adulthood paves the way, evoking new fight or flight responses, in our new world. Face your fears, trust you'll land on your feet.

I choose flight.

Vessel #2 by Robert Owen

Owen created his minimalist sculpture Vessel #2 in 2004. First installed into Chifley Plaza, Sydney, it is now in its new home at Winmark. He has called his art a 'science of consciousness': a mathematical exploration of form and structure paired with poetic, meditative thought. Owen explores geometric shapes, space, light and colour that shift and transform with the viewers changing perspective. Colour is at the core of Owen's practice and here he has used his signature Ultramarine Blue: for him the colour of infinite presence.

Sun Seekers by Patrice Cook

Patrice creates her beautifully realistic birds in ceramic with metallic painted finish. A recipient of the Bowral Sculpture Prize, her work is inspired by the patterns and textures in nature.

Todd Robinson creates gravity inspired sculptures that are provocative, strange and engaging. Interested in the force of gravity and how it is an abiding force on all things, Robinson's sculptures elicit playful amusement or feelings of sadness through their paradoxical exploration of lightness and weight, hardness and softness, movement and stasis.

In Soft Landing a large, impossibly heavy balloon balances precariously on the edge of a concrete ramp instilling a sense of tension and ambiguity, playfully interacting with the landscape and people that are drawn to it.

Memories of Pollyanna by Eoin McSwan

Grafton NSW based sculptor and Blacksmith Eoin McSwan creates beautifully crafted works. Made with handmade bulleye glass, stainless steel and corten steel, Memories of Pollyanna represents positive energy and regrowth: the leaves flittering in the breeze and the sunbeam shining through.

Delicate Balance by Michael Purdy

South coast NSW Sculptor Michael Purdy's strong interest in the environment and deep connection to the landscape is central to his artistic practice. Delicate Balance is a visual metaphor for the fragile relationship between humanity and the world we live in. It is simultaneously whimsical and serious.

Scissor, Paper, Rock by Winmark

Winmark creation using the iron (Scissor) coming out of the old swimming pool, including large round oak timber balls (Paper) and placing both adjacent to a sandstone rock (Rock) in the landscape.

Bronze Flower by Ed Hayes

This Bronze Flower is one part of a three-part installation placed at the National Sculpture Forum in the '90s and later displayed in front of the National Library of Australia. The theme was an expulsion from the Garden of Eden. The three bronzes were split after the event with Bronze Flower now residing at Winmark.

Celest by David Ball

Celest is a stargate. Its elevated form lures the viewer to gaze at a different sky, through the tension and contrast of the frail architecture that surrounds them.

Ball's work is derived from forms observed in nature. From the molecular to celestial then distilled, simplified and imagined.

Startled Geese
by Bob Teasdale
The Startled Geese sculpture came to mind after seeing magpie geese take flight when approached unexpectedly.

Don't Loose Your Grip by Stephen Paul Coburn

The ride to Wollombi is exhilarating; winding roads over hills, valleys, Lemmings Corner and Murray's Run — all dangerous. Riders lose control and SOME lose their lives. Since moving to Wollombi the sound of sirens has become familiar. Spread word on the trip:

"Go easy on the curves, don't lose your grip!"

A field of Aggies by Jim Hamilton

The Agapanthus sculptures are made of steel and painted to represent the mauve and white flowers. They never die and flower all year round. They were created in a time of intense drought in regional NSW.

Looking In | Looking Out by Greer Taylor

automotive paint on aluminium, stainless steel cable and fittings. Each tower $450 \times 120 \times 15$ cm, overall footprint approximately $450 \times 1000 \times 670$ cm installation @ Winmark 2024

looking in I looking out dances across the hillside like a self contained forest, body, cell... we see its elements signalling between each other making connections between those elements to create a whole... a whole that is being influenced by outside forces that influence – gravity, a force that we all live with — shapes the parabolic curves of the suspended cables... creating a whole within the all, as it stands within and draws in the environment around it.

As we walk towards the 'cell /body /forest' of the work, as we come to engage more closely with the individual elements, between and among the parts... the connections shift from purely visual to somatic... But this is not in isolation, our eyes and body pass messages to our brain as they experience the whole of the surrounding environment tumbled with the memories held in our cells, influencing how we react to the work and the world.

The work's title speaks of the dual activities that takes place between organisms — each looking inside, caring for its own body/its own internal system while at the same time looking out to signal to and connect with other organisms.

The Shadow Lines By Tania McMurtry

The Shadow Lines cast by an immutable sun reveal and conceal the rustic construction exposing the temporal quality in the work. Integral to the sculpture's connection with place – shadows and the viewers gaze move through space and time.

"Shadows like time, are both tangible and intangible at any given moment or realm of perspective."

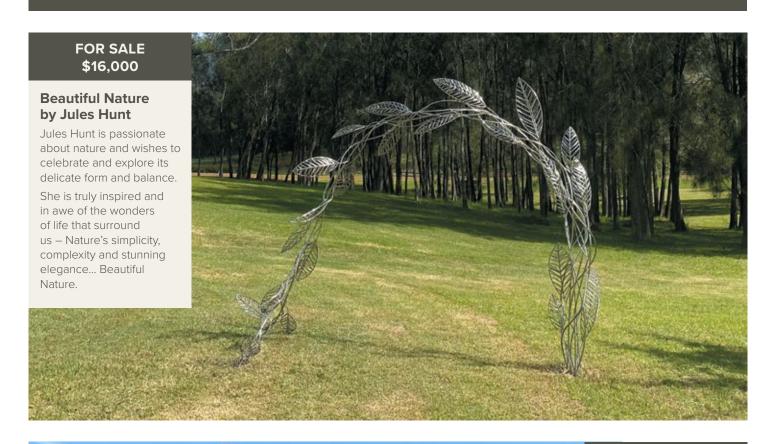

Hitesh S. Vaghani

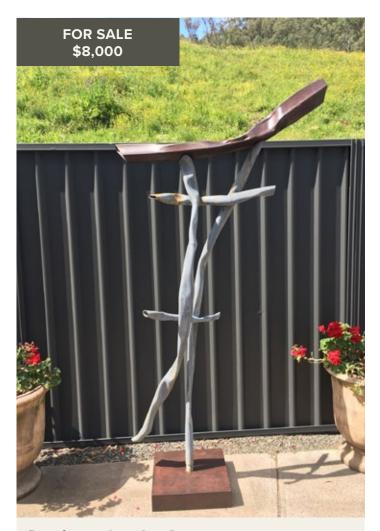

Dancing at the edge 4 by Gary Christian

Dancing at the edge 4 responds to the current climate crisis. The sculpture takes its inspiration from the concept of mythic threshold crossings, most especially Japanese torii gates that mark the transition from the everyday to the sacred. Dancing at the edge 4 encourages the viewer to pause, consider and contemplate the garden and the natural world. How might humans be more accountable to their environment? What is our responsibility to the planet; what is our responsibility to the planet, trees, animals, birds and other humans that live on this earth?

Fire Fox by Kayo Rowe

The mystery of the forest, we all fear to have fires in the forest, as human, always have fascination of fire with fear. I am going to create a wonder of fire in the forest. The Japanese folktale of the kitsunebi (Fox Fire) is in places where there'd be no presence of fire, mysterious flames would appear in a line that have gone out sometimes even appearing in yet another place. Generally the colour of the fire is red or orange, but there have been witnesses that have seen blue. It is often said that foxes trick humans, so likewise, the kitsunebi would light up places where there are no roads and make the humans lose their way. In late 15th century, the Honchō-Shokkan book contains a statement about how foxes would use withered trees on the ground to make fires. This "fox" does not refer to the animal, but instead means "withered" or "rotten and discoloured," and seeing how "fox fire" refers to the fire of withered trees and the light of hypha and mushroom roots that cling to withered trees could be seen to refer to the lights, but there are many that still go unexplained.

Fractal möbius by James Bunter

At present, to me life is a möbius, you pretty much start at the same place you finish whilst things change with every fractional moment.

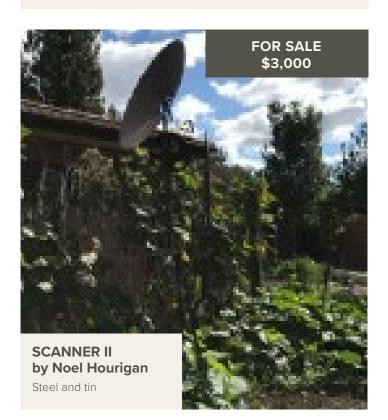

James Bunter's work draws inspiration from the organic forms in the Australian landscape, transforming raw stone into captivating pieces that evoke harmony and balance.

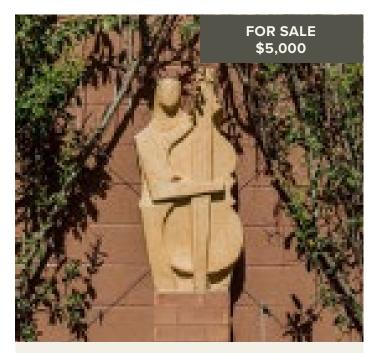

Ironbark construction 2 by Will Maguire

This simple combination of steel and native timber allows for reflection on our traditional use of materials. The materials age and bleed into each other over time holding within them a raw and powerful beauty. This work won the Newcastle Show Sculpture prize, 2020.

Enchanted CellistArtist unknown. (London circa 2000) Sandstone

Turpentine construction 6 by Will Maguire

Will Maguire's work is deeply embedded in working with materials as active and relational substances that push and pull on our shared world. Informed by his industrial training, Maguire often searches for beauty and complexity within raw honest forms.
